To be successful, students with disabilities must have access to the general-education curriculum, ideally learning alongside their nondisabled peers. Research shows that achievement improves significantly among students with disabilities when they are educated primarily in the general-education classroom, which research also shows is the least restrictive environment.